

I'm not as worried about the small issue that most media outlets are focused on. The speeds thing is FAR from my issue. It's the throttling, the data caps, the impending increase in package prices. these are the same companies that tried to sue the FCC over letting third party manufacturers make cheaper versions of their cable boxes...all because they would have a SLIGHT decrease in profits.

Or what about the "FCC Regulatory Fee" that you get charged for on your monthly bill?

funny thing is (while it's only 5$ or less) the company is allowed to pay these fees which are used for the transmission of analog channels which you may or may not use, but they pass these fees on to the consumer.

They pass off the COST OF DOING BUSINESS, on the consumer.

without regulation these companies can and WILL take advantage and pass as many of these business expenses on to the consumer as possible...why?

simply...because they CAN!

If you give these companies and inch...they'll take a COUNTRY.
